

About the Authors

Amy Buening is a senior political science and international studies major and a recipient of the Harry S. Truman Scholarship. Amy hopes to attend graduate school, obtaining a Masters of Science in Foreign Service and plans to utilize her degree in the employment of the federal government. This paper, written for Senior Seminar, was prompted by Amy's study abroad experience at Oxford University.

Dan Glade is a senior Religion and Political Science major from Port Byron, IL. His academic focus is American religious pluralism with special emphasis on the topic of acculturation in American Muslim communities. The paper, "Dissonant Politics in Mubarak's Egypt" was written as a senior thesis project in Dr. Frank Boyd's Comparative Politics Political Science Senior Seminar.

Megan Presnak, originally from Glenwood, IL, earned her Bachelor of Arts degree from Illinois Wesleyan University in December, 2004 with majors in Political Science and History. This paper was completed for her International/Comparative Political Science Senior Seminar during the Fall Semester of 2004. Megan will be moving to Washington, D.C. this summer, where she plans to pursue her MA in International Relations.

Lavanga Wijekoon graduated from IWU in December 2004 as a Political Science / International Studies double major. He is currently an intern at the McLean County Public Defender's Office as well as a Residential Counselor for youths dealing with substance abuse issues at Chestnut Health Systems in Bloomington. He hopes to pursue a Juris Doctor degree in International Relations at American University in Washington DC. His paper was written as part of his International Studies Senior Seminar.

Ryan A. Kemper is a senior Political Science major with a minor in Legal Studies. His work has been concentrated in the areas of U.S. Social Policy and American Civil Liberties. "U.S. Drug Control Policy: Clinging to an Outdated Philosophy," was written as a term paper for a course in American Public Policy (PSCI 350) in the spring of 2004. Ryan is currently considering law school options and intends to begin working toward a J.D. in the fall of 2005.

Katharine Egan is a political science major currently studying environmental conservation in Australia. In the future, she plans to work in the fields of human and (other) animal rights and environmental protection. Someday, she hopes to found an orphanage. This paper was written as part of an independent study carried out as part of her political science senior seminar.

Allison Bannerman is a sophomore Political Science major from Bainbridge Island, Washington. At IWU, Alli participates in the Promise and Potential coaching program with BJHS, tutors at Bent Elementary, works with Admissions through Ambassadors Club, and is an active member of Sigma Kappa. She became interested in the US Constitution in high school, and Constitutional Law at IWU renewed and deepened her inquiry.